What is ESG (Environmental, Social, and Governance)?

ESG is the acronym for Environmental, Social, and Governance, the three broad categories, or areas, of interest for what is termed “socially responsible investors.” They are investors who consider it important to incorporate their values and concerns (such as environmental concerns) into their selection of investments instead of simply considering the potential profitability and/or risk presented by an investment opportunity

E = Environment Empathy

The melting glaciers, rise in average temperature globally have brought before us the pitfalls of global warming.

The fast reducing forest cover, major rivers getting polluted, and higher presence of pollutants in air all are examples of ways mankind is neglecting the environment.

Environmental criteria include a company's use of renewable energy sources, its waste management program, how it handles potential problems of air or water pollution arising from its operations, deforestation issues (if applicable), and its attitude and actions around climate change issues.

Other possible environmental issues include raw material sourcing (e.g., does the company use fair trade suppliers and organic ingredients?) and whether a company follows biodiversity practices on land it owns or controls

S = Social Responsibility

For running their business, corporates draw raw material and manpower from the area in which they operate

While engaging with these resources, it is fair to expect the companies to handle resources in a fair, optimal and in a socially responsible manner

Social criteria cover a vast range of potential issues. There are many separate social aspects of ESG, but all of them are essentially about social relationships. One of the key relationships for a company, from the point of view of many socially responsible investors, is its relationship with its employees.

G = Corporate Governance

Corporate Governance is all about integrity and honesty of the management.

Financial and accounting transparency and full and honest financial reporting are often considered key elements of good corporate governance. Also important are board members acting in a genuine fiduciary relationship with stockholders and being careful to avoid conflicts of interest with that duty.
